

The iConnected Parent

by Barbara K. Hofer and Abigail Sullivan Moore

The iConnected Parent, Hofer and Moore, had a lot of interesting information about how the recent changes in communication styles have impacted the rate that our children are maturing into independent adults.

The college experience used to be a transition period, a time when students could test out making their own choices and decisions without input from mom and dad. With cell phones, texting and email along with Facebook and Twitter, studies have found that with this increased accessibility college is no longer that same transition period; the road to adulthood is actually delayed.

This book brings to light the importance of setting appropriate boundaries, both parents and students, so that parents can step back and allow their students the space to grow up.
